throat.

She could not resist slipping it on again—just to see how bad it was. Slowly she turned around before the long mirror in her closet door.

Relucantly she admitted that in spit of the glaring defects the dress had a certain style and grace, and was undeniably becoming. She turned up the skirt and examined the seams—yes, they were large enough to let out. yes, they were large enough to let out. The skirt could be made at least three inches wider. And that drawn look over the hips—would letting the seams out help that?

The instinct to "fix things" was always strong in Helen. And the next moment she had the dress off and was sitting on the floor recklessly ripping it up. At any rate she could not hart it. She could not make it any worse than it was,

She had forgotten all about the letter. Her only thought now was to finish the dress so that she could wear it that evening. They were not going out, but Helen always wanted to wear a new gown the first time at

It was casy to rip and haste, but the sewing was much more sedious, and it was almost six before she finally slipped on the now remodeled gown. The satisfaction of having overcome a difficulty by her own ingenuity helped to obligate her resentment. So it was with a certain pleased consciousness that she ran to meet Warren.

"Hello, what you all colled up for?"
"Do you like it?" eagerly. "This is

"Turn around," critically. "What's this dangling thing?"

"Oh, that's all right—that's the sash. But what about the general effect! Does it set well around the hips? Do you like the way the shirt hangs! She charged me enough for making it—$18. It ought to be right."

"Looks all right to me."

Very Different.

"Well, it wasn't when it came," de-cidedly. "I had to practically make it over-look how I've let out these seams? I was furious at first—but I think it does look pretty well now." Just then Nora called Helen into the kitchen, and Warren sat down at the desk to lock over some papers he had brought from the office. Helen's un-finished leter to the dressmaker lay before him. His glance fell on one of the sentences she had tried to make

DYNAMITE EXPLOSIONS

EXCITE STRIKEBREAKERS

Trinidad, Colo, Nov. 15.—Two explosions of what is believed to have been dynamite occurred at St. Thomas, a mining camp adjoining the Colorado Fuel and Iron company's property at Sopris. It is thought these explosions were caused by strikers who desired to intimulate miners working at St. Thomas and Sopris. The explosions make three of similar nature, which have been recorded there since the militia entered the strike zone.

The explosions have wrought the non-union miners to a high tension of nervousness, and coripany officials fear some of them will not have the temerity to remain at work if this form of violence continues. Strikers from other camps continue flocking into Ludlow, and adjutnat general Chase is at a loss to understand their purpose. To guard against emergencies, however, he will increase the militia guard at Ludlow.
